

Mikylvxka Hllupo
Robert Ellsworth Feng

I step into my room,

lock the door,
close the windows,
and turn the lights off.
The room is dead.
The room is cold.
The devil whispers a lullaby.

I close my eyes.
As silence looms
and the room awakens,
the walls sprint away.
The ceiling joins the nebulae above.
The floorboard sinks into a hole
like fine white sands rushing down an hourglass
There is no room
I am the room
I am nothing
I am all.

My head erupts into clouds of bismuth.
I watch my body shrink,
disappear,
until I'm zipping at the speed of light.
The night sky blurs,
Stars transmuted
into radiant streams of epiphany
My soul splits into trillions of atoms bursting in all directions overwhelmed
by terror sublime.

The Eye of God speaks to me
in a conch shell melody,
casting the shadow of the four suns.
The iris,
a black halo,
a rainbow of colors I've never seen before,
engulfs the soul with inescapable gravity.

The Eye of God splits open my skull
allowing for the purest wine to flow
from the river of life and light.
It knows all and understands nothing,
but I comprehend.

The Eye of God is the grand spiral,
the universal whole,
the constant nothing,
the great I AM
and
I am nothing
I am the universe
I am the spiral.

I am every molecule of air
and every photon splattering colour on Earth's blank canvas, giving birth to emerald valleys and scorched canyons.
I am the truth.

The EYE
The I.
watching me.
My third eye awakened,
God paints an image:

a black mass of
spiders and crows
crawling, contorting their appendages,
confined to the cancerous glue that imprisons them,
cackling at the demon they've created.
A sinister tumor with porcelain horns
scraping holes in the sky.

maggots and worms convulsing as one,
infecting one another with their poison,
which comes from the oozing, black hearts of angels
smote down from the kingdom.

The creature screams at me with its static howl.
Ouroboros circle its red, bulging eyes.
The red eyes that illuminate the abyss
and peer into my deepest fears.

Secrets hidden deep within my castle,
secrets that I will take to my grave.